NetGalley adds support for excerpts via Dial-a-Book, Firebrand’s excerpts service

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

December 2, 2015---NetGalley today announced that shareable excerpts are now available on book pages in NetGalley when they are included in the Dial-a-Book excerpt database. Dial-a-Book, part of Firebrand Technologies, is a free service for publishers which creates, aggregates and distributes first chapter excerpts to industry partners such as BN.com, Baker & Taylor TitleSource, EBSCO/host, ArcaMax, Cokesbury, and libraries subscribing to OCLC FirstSearch/WorldCat.

“NetGalley members already share thousands of reviews and recommendations each week through the site,” commented Susan Ruszala, NetGalley’s President. “Now members can read and share excerpts as well, making it even easier to build and sustain buzz about new books, or engage with a previously-published book when the digital galley is no longer available.”

Fran Toolan, CEO of Firebrand Technologies, added, “Publishers and authors can easily opt in to the Dial-a-Book service, now numbering over 400,000 first chapter excerpts, at no cost. We’re delighted to add NetGalley to the growing list of recipients who use our excerpts to fuel discoverability and engagement.”

When publishers opt in to Dial-a-Book, excerpts are created, automatically delivered to NetGalley and added to book records. NetGalley also accepts excerpts delivered within the publisher’s ONIX feed. Publishers in North America, the UK, Australia and France can opt in to the service, as can individual authors who list a title on NetGalley. One of the benefits of the NetGalley-Dial-a-Book partnership is that excerpts can be delivered further ahead of publication, giving enthusiastic readers the earliest chance to read and share.
